

Stickman Gets Some Of His Stolen Sticks Back:

Stickman: I always get on people's cases because of long and tedious comments. Mine are usually very short and to the point. Today is an exception, as it's a bit slow and I have a few things to say, so bear with me. As for story two, I did have a young woman come by yesterday, maybe in her early 20's, that got out of a SUV and was carrying 7 or 8 very fine looking walking sticks. I recognized them as mine, and was very intrigued. She told me her sister was going out with this guy and eventually broke up with him, as he was a bit wild and ended up in jail for something. But, her sister also mentioned that he was one of the guys that stole some sticks from the stickman about a month ago that some of you might remember. This really pissed off this young woman, as she knows who I am and what I do. So, the both of them went over to his apartment and found about half of the sticks that were taken from me that night and took them, and she brought them to me yesterday. She was very apologetic and I told her that she shouldn't be, especially that she wasn't the one that did it and I appreciated her bold move and courage to do what she did. It brought a tear to this old man's eye and I thanked her many times for what she did. She was adamant that if you want a stick, come and ask and you will always get a very fine one for free. I asked her if she is going to kick that guys ass whenever she sees him again, and I might have given her an idea. I realize they were drunk that night and thought what they were doing was fun, but no one else did and she took it upon herself to do something about it. It definitely restored some of my faith in humanity and there are actually very many people out there that are good and would always do the right thing. I had to share, and the sticks have been cleaned up and put along the wall again for any and all that want one. I won't bore you anymore, as sometimes I get carried away. See you this Sunday.
