

Kiki Miller, a longtime Coeur d'Alene resident and community activist, announced today that she is a candidate for the Coeur d'Alene City Council.

Miller has lived in Coeur d'Alene since 1975 and has been involved in numerous civic and leadership projects over the past several decades.

"Our community has evolved in recent years and I respect the interests of both longtime residents who have lived here all their life, as well as the newcomers to our community who are passionate about our North Idaho quality of life."

"I'm running for city council because I've spent the last 30 years being involved in multiple aspects of community service, promoting our region, and civic projects that have helped to create our great city," said Miller. "We have challenges in the near future, but we can have positive outcomes if we involve the creative vision of the entire community."

Miller's vision for the city includes a quality education system, a diverse offering of sustainable jobs, responsible planning, and strong fiscal management in order to grow the local economy, while protecting the natural resources and quality of life that we all enjoy.

"My experience as a local entrepreneur, community activist, and civic leader has provided a great perspective to our community," said Miller. "I'm hoping to provide a voice for area residents, while shaping a positive future for our community."

Miller and her husband Craig have one son, Oskar, who attends Lake City High School. She has owned Kagey Company, Inc., a local marketing, publication, and promotions firm, since 1992. Miller has served as a Coeur d'Alene Chamber of Commerce Executive Director, as a Women's Center Board Member, and has been named Volunteer of the Year for both the Coeur d'Alene and Post Falls Chambers. She also received Woman of the Year honors from the local Soroptimist organization and has volunteered or been appointed to several leadership roles for numerous organizations.
